Hong Kong schools ready for boycotts as pupils sit revamped tests

Member of committee reviewing controversial exam reveals she quit after her suggestions to solve the problem of overdrilling were ignored

The first pupils sat rebranded tests on Thursday, with schools prepared for anyone boycotting the exams. On the same day, it emerged that a member of a committee tasked with reviewing the controversial assessments of Primary Three pupils had quit three months ago, citing health reasons and complaints that her ideas were ignored.

The BCA replaces the Territory-wide System Assessment, which was designed to enhance learning and teaching but became synonymous with the city's high-pressure drilling methods. Some educators claimed the test was used as a basis to determine school closures, but the Education Bureau repeatedly denied such claims. The bureau said the revised test had eliminated the incentive to overdrill, adding that all government-subsidised schools would have to take part in the rebranded exercise this year.

Parents said overdrilling was still present in schools and called for a boycott of the tests.

Principal Lee of Grantham College of Education Past Students' Association Whampoa Primary School, which let parents choose if they wanted their child to take part, said the school was prepared if any pupil did not want to be tested as they had earmarked reserves.

“Out of our 141 Primary Three students, the parents of 20 chose not to take part,” the principal said.

Three other schools told the Post they would let parents decide if their children should take part.

Separately, Professor Magdalena Mok from Education University said she had quit the government-tasks committee because of poor health, but she also felt her views had not been heard. She had suggested the tests be conducted without naming the school, which she believed would eliminate the incentive for drilling.

Another committee member, who spoke anonymously, said other members had views accepted and rejected. The member also believed that the committee decided on keeping the names of schools to ensure they could get data on their students' performance to improve learning and teaching.

The written assessments for Chinese, English and mathematics, taken by all Primary Three pupils at the schools, take place on June 13 and 14.
